(Feb. 7, 2016) -(PR.com)- Cybersecurity researchers with the Microsoft Malware Protection Center (MMPC) revealed Friday that what is believed to be a new variant of the banking malware ZeusSakula is targeting Russian and Belarusian victims in a report published this morning on the MMPC website. The new variant, which is called ZeusSS.exe, is capable of using a new Remote Desktop Protocol (RDP) server and has been seen by the MMPC since at least late February. Last week, the MMPC researchers spotted a new variant of Zeus, which they called Zeusv4.3. The new version allows a user to change a C&C (command and control) server, as well as the communication protocol. It is believed that the new version is being used by a new actor, which is believed to be the same group behind the ZeusSakula malware. It also has the ability to steal virtual wallet balances. Users are likely to encounter this malware in form of phishing emails, in which the malware appears legitimate but does not provide adequate warning and security. This malware uses specific strings and registry entries to tie it to the Sakula malware, which was originally written to steal money from banks in Bulgaria. As previously mentioned, the new variant of ZeusSS.exe is known to be capable of stealing money from virtual wallet balances. Users are likely to encounter this malware in form of phishing emails, in which the malware appears legitimate but does not provide adequate warning and security. “We first observed this version in late February and have since observed hundreds of new infections in over 35 countries,” said Andrei Sharov, Manager of Threat Research in the Microsoft Malware Protection Center. “This new version of the Zeus malware does not require a victim to download any other malware or any additional payloads. Instead, it uses a simple malicious PDF attachment that contains a remote RDP server.” For now, the victims appear to be primarily located in Russia and Belarus, although this may be changing as the campaign
