Current guidelines favor a risk-stratified approach for the use of secondary thromboprophylaxis. The optimal duration of pharmacological prophylaxis is unknown, as is the risk of recurrent venous thromboembolism (VTE) following extended duration. We sought to describe the 15-year outcomes of those on an extended duration of secondary VTE prophylaxis. All patients that received prolonged secondary prophylaxis for VTE at the Royal Hallamshire Hospital in Sheffield, United Kingdom (1993-2007) were included. Those that were known to be alive and free from thromboembolic events were contacted by telephone to validate the data. Data on morbidity and mortality were collected from the hospital admission database and the clinical notes, and all deaths were validated by the national death register. Sixty-nine patients were identified: 40 females and 29 males. One patient had a documented recurrence of VTE during follow-up. One patient was lost to follow-up. Twenty-nine patients (42%) were alive and free from thromboembolism. Forty-five patients (68%) died during the follow-up period. Seventeen patients (25%) died of systemic cancer. In all, 12 patients (17%) died of a cardiorespiratory cause, and five (7%) died of sepsis. Two further patients (3%) died of unknown causes. The mean survival was 244 ± 15 days (95% confidence interval (CI), 212-268), and the median survival was 353 days (interquartile range, 152-630 days). Patients who were alive and free from thromboembolism at 15 years had a 41% absolute survival rate, and a 6% relative survival rate. No patient developed recurrent VTE after a mean follow-up of 1130 ± 532 days (95%
