The day I began teaching at George Washington University in 1996, the Department of History was composed of the faculty of the History and American Studies departments. The division was created to accommodate the small number of students from the “arts and humanities” (read: not philosophy, not economics, not the hard sciences) attending GWU. The move was intended to help students graduate more quickly and get into graduate school more easily. The plan was to get them out of the undergraduate classroom as soon as possible. My first classes were small, and I taught the same twenty-two students—consisting of nine American History majors, five English majors, one philosophy major, and three who only wanted a degree for the “artsy” 2d92ce491b
