Behçet's disease is an inflammatory joint and/or eye disease with unknown etiology, characterized by a variety of clinical manifestations. The thoracic and/or lumbosacral lesions are extremely rare in Behçet's disease. We reported an unusual case of Behçet's disease with thoracic and lumbosacral lesions. A 10-year-old boy was admitted with central cyanosis, anemia, polyarthritis and myalgia. The diagnosis was Behçet's disease on the basis of the clinical manifestations and positive HLA-B51. His chest roentgenogram and MRI of thoracic spine revealed multiple intrathoracic nodules with an intrathoracic cystic mass. Lumbosacral MRI showed a normal appearance. On the fifth admission, the both knees were partially stiff, but they were relieved by synovectomy. Thoracic and lumbosacral lesions with Behçet's disease are extremely rare. Our case was characterized by recurrent pulmonary lesions, intrathoracic and intra-abdominal cystic lesions.Cerebellar involvement in pediatric obsessive-compulsive disorder. To examine neuroimaging and behavioral abnormalities in children with pediatric obsessive-compulsive disorder (OCD), we enrolled 23 children (12 boys, 11 girls) with OCD and 18 age- and sex-matched healthy children (9 boys, 9 girls) in a within-subject, cross-sectional study that included magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) of the brain and a battery of neuropsychological tests.
