The.38 Special+P is chambered for the.38 Special cartridge and has a long barrel and a 7-8 inch throat height. The.38 Super is chambered for the.38 Super cartridge and has a short barrel. The.38 Super+P has a slightly larger capacity (6+1) than the.38 Special+P (5+1) and a little larger overall capacity than the.38 Special (4+1). This article will describe how to shoot both the.38 Special+P and the.38 Super+P. .38+P Manual Loading Most shooters do their shooting from a benchrest position. The safe and reasonable position from which to shoot. In order to hold the revolver, the chamber must be in the open, or forward position. When the chamber is forward, the hammer should be at rest and the cylinder open. To manually load the.38+P, first place a live round of ammunition in the chamber, then close the cylinder. With the revolver held in the open, grasp the cylinder and release the safety. As you do this, the hammer will drop to the cocked position. If the hammer is not cocked, release the safety, then cock the hammer by pulling it back. Once the hammer is cocked, pull the trigger. This will fire the first round. To load the revolver with another round, again place the live round in the chamber, close the cylinder, then grasp the cylinder and release the safety. As you do this, the hammer will drop to the cocked position. If the hammer is not cocked, release the safety,
