Three years ago I went out to lunch with a friend from England. I had been wearing a cute little green and white striped sweater that I had just purchased. (I was planning on wearing it over a tank top that day.) I had tucked the end of the sweater in, so there was only a fold of fabric between my leg and my shoe. When I turned to say something to my friend and her husband, I caught sight of their shoes, which were identical to mine. I was mortified, since the shoes were pink and black and they weren't mine. My friend knew what I was thinking and she helped me out. By the end of lunch, I was wearing a pair of my (now my sister's) black loafers. I had no idea that this incident would come back to haunt me, so when I saw these photos on google+ I thought they were cute, since my kids wear sparkly tights all the time, and pink is my favorite color. As it turns out, these are for the Halloween Costume Store in Milledgeville, Georgia. I'm not one for Halloween. I don't like the candy, the costumes, the not-so-fun jokes, or the crowds. In fact, I don't like the crowds in general. The sight of others makes me anxious, especially at restaurants and grocery stores. So I figured that perhaps the costumes had a magical quality to them, if only in my mind. I still plan on not wearing anything much at Halloween. I might wear a long dress or something, but for now I'll continue to forgo the costumes. I'm not a dress person anyway, but I will never, ever be comfortable in a 2d92ce491b
