The antihypertensive effects of daily administration of a low calorie diet (500 kcal) for 30 days, were compared to those of a diet of 1700 kcal of which the high calorie contents resulted from the intake of an additional 70 g of sucrose. The diet was either rich (53% of energy) in essential nutrients like protein and lipids, or poor (10%) in all nutrients except sucrose. The level of dietary sodium was measured to evaluate if the hypertensive response might result from a high dietary sodium intake. The antihypertensive action of the low calorie diet was maintained for the whole study period, while the low calorie diet and the high calorie diets rich in proteins and lipids resulted in a less evident, but statistically significant, decrease in blood pressure. The increase in urinary sodium resulted in a proportional increase in blood pressure in both control and low calorie diet groups. The results of the present study show that an adequate low calorie diet for 30 days elicits an antihypertensive action that is maintained for a long time. Furthermore, these results suggest that the dietary choice itself, either rich or poor in nutrients, is an important modulating factor in blood pressure and that sucrose is essential in the preparation of a low calorie diet. Discriminative stimulus effects of delta9-tetrahydrocannabinol in dogs. The effects of delta9-tetrahydrocannabinol (delta9-THC) on lever pressing in pigeons and operant punished responding in dogs were assessed. The ability of a trained dog to discriminate between a training dose of 3 mg/kg delta9-THC and saline was first determined by the choice between responding on a single lever for access to drug or on different levers for access to saline. A dose of 0.03 mg/kg delta9-THC was then presented in an attempt to determine the effectiveness of a training dose of the drug. A dose of 0.3 mg/kg delta9-THC produced responding that was more similar to saline than did a training dose, although there was still a small amount of appropriate responding. The results indicate that a dose of 0.3 mg/kg delta9-THC can be used successfully to discriminate between delta9-THC and saline in dogs. The discriminative stimulus effects of delta9-THC were tested in two dogs trained to discriminate between a drug state (0.3 mg/kg delta9-THC) and a control state (3 ba244e880a
