The funding of Sustainable Development Goals

The SDGs serve a very important purpose for the world's political and financial leaders. They want a "goal" for the world's countries to work towards, which of course gives them some leverage to get a "comprehensive, integrated, and people-centred approach to sustainable development" out of the G20, E3, and the rest of the world's intergovernmental organisations. The SDGs are a very important part of the template for the transition from the decades-long linear economic growth model of the industrial age towards a model based on sustainable, circular economies that are not just inclusive of the world's poorest, but of all of humanity. However, the SDGs are not a free lunch for the world's richest countries, and are politically, fiscally and socially complex, even if they have the potential to make a huge difference. To put it simply, the poorer countries need the money to be able to make the SDGs happen. This is where the Sustainable Development Finance Network comes in. So, in the next few years, the SDFN will be talking to its members, especially the finance ministries and central banks in the G20 and the E3, about the funding that is needed to make the SDGs happen. We want to make sure that the funding that is pledged to making the SDGs happen is not just financially but also politically sustainable. This will be tough, and we will be working with our partners at the Treasury, the IMF, the World Bank, the United Nations and governments around the world. However, we will need the support of leaders in the governments, central banks and finance ministries in the G20 and the E3 to make this happen. Are you interested in supporting the SDFN? If so, do sign up to our mailing list to be kept up to date. If you'd like to have the official documents of the SDG's, they are freely available here: IAMWiki: SDGs
