The S-Curve is one of the most basic and used tools in Photoshop. It can be used for creating brushes and to spline paths (create lines that can be moved, copied, and pasted with a keyboard shortcut). Paths are a fast and simple way to create shapes and lines in Photoshop. The Pen tool is one of the most useful tools and is generally used in painting and illustrating, creating shapes and lines. There are many more tools and techniques within Photoshop, which can be learned as you need them. For the best experience, learn to master them all. For instance, if you have an image that you want to brighten, use the Dodge tool to selectively lighten the area. If you want to be more accurate, use the Rectangular Marquee Tool to select a specific area, and use the Eraser tool to selectively erase it. And if you want to be more precise, use the Lasso Tool to select an exact area and use the Clone Stamp tool to copy and paste that area. For more free tutorials, keep reading! Paint With The Pen Tool There are several ways to select a specific area in an image to paint or clone onto using the Pen tool, including the Brush, Type Tool, and Lasso tools. The Brush tool is the most basic way to paint images. It lets you paint an area by using settings similar to those of a paint bucket, except with a brush. The Type tool is used to pick colors out of one image and paste them into another area of an image. It has many options that allow you to select a range of colors and have them copy onto the new image. If you want to select a specific area, you can do so with the Lasso tool by drawing with a cursor and setting points to ensure the drawn line isn't too big. The Lasso tool can also be used to create shapes from multiple points. These shapes can be moved, flipped, rotated, and mirrored. Image copyright PA Doctors in England should be paid properly, the Labour Party is to announce. At the moment, the NHS is forcing doctors into a contract that discourages them from seeking to be paid more than they would be if they were working for private companies. The health service has been saying that new NHS salaried doctors should be paid on a salary basis, and this is the reason why some are reluctant to work in the NHS. Labour says doctors should be paid on an earnings basis, so any increase in their earnings would count in their gross earnings and therefore be taxable. Doctors have seen a 32% real-terms squeeze on their earnings over the last decade, which has led to fewer of them going into NHS work. 'Not in the NHS' Campaigners for fairer pay for doctors say they want to ensure that no doctor is shut out of NHS work, and say that should be their overriding priority. One of the drivers is also to ensure that doctors who are willing to work in the NHS are properly rewarded. The NHS doctors' pay has come under increasing political pressure in the UK since the introduction of changes made by the coalition in 2010 which were designed to help the NHS to stop losing money. The doctors' leaders have said that a lot of the pressure on their income comes from the NHS. Image copyright Reuters Image caption The NHS has been seeing a fall in its patient numbers Health Secretary Jeremy Hunt has promised to address the situation. He has said that he wants to take action within 12 weeks of a report into whether the new system of pay for doctors is working properly. He says he wants to find the best system of pay for doctors which will mean everyone in the NHS gets the best for their job. But the Health Secretary has not committed to any reform. In his Spring Statement to the Commons in March, Mr Hunt said the NHS needed to be seen to be changing for the better. He said: "Let me make this absolutely clear: there will be no return to the way the NHS was run under Labour. "The NHS will never be run like the old days. The reforms I introduced will bring that day closer. We will end the open-ended sums of money we give the NHS and give doctors and nurses a budget based on what we spend and what they deliver. "We will give the NHS a budget for investment which will
