In order to find out whether changes in manic symptoms can be achieved by pharmacotherapy, we studied 17 manic inpatients before and during a 4-week treatment with antipsychotic drugs. They were rated at intervals with the Kraepelin and St. Louis Psychotic Rating Scales. Before the treatment was started, manic symptoms were well controlled by medication. There were significant improvements in most of the manic items, including the manic syndrome, the delusions, the content of the hallucinatory thoughts, the thought disorder, and the mania item, whereas only the elevated mood changed significantly over the period of observation. The depression, the anxiety, the suicidality, and the disturbances in social functions did not improve. No significant change was observed in the antipsychotic dosage during the study. Significant correlations between changes in manic symptoms and changes in the therapeutic dosage of antipsychotics were found in terms of the manic syndrome, the content of the hallucinations, and the mania item.Q: Python - Defining a variable that can be returned as a variable I've been working on this Python script for a while now.
