Apple Music mean for the music industry in 2017? 23 Mar 2016 A new CEO is taking the helm for the music industry, but some industry experts say the headcount change may be more evidence of a changing media landscape than anything. Apple Music -- which should be available in November as an iOS app that will be free to users of the mobile operating system -- is one of the major moves being considered. The company, which is valued at $1 trillion, launched last week with a 90-minute live event to introduce the service. Apple chief executive Tim Cook touted the app as "the best music streaming service in the world," implying it will rule the roost among the industry's major players. "It's important to think about the music you love and how it fits into your life," Cook said on stage. "That's the context in which you use it." The service is aimed at people who want their music with them at all times. "If I'm on the couch watching a movie, I want to be able to pull up a song that would sound great with the movie," he said. "If I'm taking my daughter to a concert, I want a service where the service I use is going to be tied to my phone so I can just take it with me to wherever

I'm going and listen to the music I want." Just what makes Apple Music -- which will compete with services like Spotify and Rdio -- so special? For one thing, it has an iOS app that can be downloaded to your phone -- thus there is no need to use your computer to access the service. Apple has also made the sign-up process free. That should help unify Apple Music with the other company services Apple offers. "It is hard to imagine Apple Music being as successful without the iPhone, the iPad, the Mac," Doug Creutz, an analyst at Cowen and Co., said in a note
