Targeted replacement of lysine and arginine residues in dystrophic muscle was investigated by feeding mice a purified diet containing one of the corresponding alpha-amino acids. It was found that mice in the experimental group fed lysine-supplemented food and lacking selenium and vitamin E in their diet showed a massive wasting of cytoplasmic components and necrosis of muscle cells. Lipid accumulation in muscle fibres was also enhanced. The mice, both those fed the lysine-supplemented diet and those fed the basal diet, eventually died of muscle necrosis. Arginine supplementation resulted in an increase in the levels of creatine kinase in the serum and in the activity of arginase in the liver and to an improvement of dystrophic symptoms. However, these effects were considerably lower than those associated with the lysine diet. The results indicate that targeted therapy with the amino acids is an important therapeutic approach in the treatment of muscular dystrophy. The possible mechanism of action is discussed.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a semiconductor device, a thin film transistor, and a display apparatus. 2. Description of the Related Art Examples of a semiconductor device having a plurality of thin film transistors include a thin film transistor using an oxide semiconductor film (TFT of oxide type) (for example, see Reference 1). For example, Reference 1 discloses a TFT with a top gate structure. [Reference 1] Japanese Published Patent Application No. 2006-329526. (from the beginning until the end of the turn). A turn symbol will appear on the right-hand side of the turn number in blue ink (and perhaps with other colours). There are some turns which start before the start of a turn phase, so they cannot be tracked if it is just a series of turns, but not before the start of a turn phase (i.e. they are left off the board). A mark/bracket will appear around the stop (after the mark/bracket at
