I was playing an old puzzle game I used to play on my TI-84 Plus CE, and I got stuck on the third level of the game. The object is to dig holes around a beehive and fill each hole back up with the bees after retrieving the honey. However, if you are too slow, you run the risk of ruining your chances in getting the honey. You must try and balance these risks, as they scale depending on how fast you dig. You start with a shovel that you can dig with two shovels. With each use, each shovel gets one unit of movement. Whenever you dig with a shovel, you reveal five units of movement that you can use to carry out what you want (and thus gaining one bar on the time gauge). The "Restart" button (which is what you use to restart from the last save) is also available when it is available, which speeds up the time rate by one whole bar. You can also use the "Cancel" button to instantly halt all digging. When you hit the beehive, the bees immediately fly away. You can take however much honey you want from each hive, and then have the same beehive forever. Here are the rules, for those who are curious: Each time you dig, you can dig with two shovels. This gives you an extra five units of time, and you can never go back over the five units of time, but I'm not sure if it gives you anything else or not. It could be that digging with the shovels gives you something else. Initially you only start with one shovel, which I don't think matters at all. Each time you use a shovel, a wrench will fall, which is used to fill up the holes. You can use the wrench for as many times as you want. The more you do so, the more slowly you will have to dig to fill up the holes again. You can use the "Restart" button at any time to restart from the last save. You start with seven bars of time on the time gauge, and at the start of the game, the beehive takes three bars. You can e24f408de9
