How do you know that people are still living where you grew up? It's easy—if you live there. But if you visit your parents or in-laws over the holidays, you might not get a true sense of how old and old-fashioned your hometown has become. In fact, as American cities and suburbs continue to age, a number of communities have been losing residents. Whether by choice, lifestyle, or demographic shift, older adults are relocating more and more often—and it's having a significant impact on where Americans choose to live. Americans born between 1930 and 1960 have some of the highest rates of relocation in the country, with each generation of Americans moving about 10 percent more than the one before it. But it's not just baby boomers that are leaving. The latest Census Bureau report shows that the Great Recession and subsequent economic recession have taken a toll on where Americans are moving and where they stay. "The recession has really affected where families choose to live in a very negative way," says Jane Adler Arsenault, director of the Metropolitan Housing and Communities Policy Center at the Brookings Institution. "Not only did we lose people to the foreclosure crisis, but we lost people because people had to cut back on living expenses." With fewer resources, fewer financial incentives to move, and with children and grandchildren increasingly packed into cities, American suburbs are increasingly becoming little more than places to drive through and grab lunch. In 1990, the suburbs of the Greater Chicago Metropolitan Statistical Area were home to half of all residents, but by 2015 they accounted for just 29 percent of residents, according to a 2015 study by the University of Illinois-Chicago's Regional Economic Information Network. "Thirty-five years ago, there were more households in the suburbs than there were in the city," says Mark Kleiman, a professor of public policy at New York University and author of the book, More Liberty, Less Government. "By 2015, that was flipped." Economic data backs up those numbers. In 1990, 30 percent of households in the Chicago metropolitan area lived outside the city limits. By 2015, that number had increased to 38 percent. "The reality is that the suburban areas have to try to keep up with the way the economies
