What's New In?

Diphone Marker is a simple tool designed for the creation of speech diphone databases with MBROLA. The application contains a main window with an MBROLA editor on it. It supports editing of speech-diphones stored in a TTS format, and writing diphones in a WAV format. A separate window allows for creating of new diphones, loading of existing diphones, and exporting of diphones to the TTS format. Features: An MBROLA editor is available to select the melodic tone to be used for the diphone. Each diphone may be generated with one or more tones. Tones are selected by clicking on an icon located on the left. The icon's shape depends on the parameter you use. The central part of the icon is a 3-octave keyboard. A text editor is available to select the pitch duration of the diphone. An export dialog for WAV, WX, and TTS formats. My question is what resources and files I should have on the server. Is it a good idea to have all the files (html, css, javascript and other things) on the server? or is it good to place the files on the server and put them on the user computer using a button "download" that downloads the files to the user computer? Is it a good idea to have a page that has a file with a button to download the files? A: I think the best way to decide if you should place all of the files on the server or the client is to decide where you think is the natural point of control. If the files should always be on the client, then you should place them all on the client. If the files should be on the server, then you should also put them on the server. If you decide that the files should be on the server, then you will typically have to place the files on the server. Otherwise, your users will download the files (without you really wanting them to) and the server will be overwhelmed with requests. But if you decide to place the files on the client, then you can decide what to do with the files. You could tell your users to go to a particular page (e.g. download.html) and have that page contain a button that would download the files. Or you could let them get to the files by going to a different page (e
