Its concept is similar to the finite difference method. However, a ramp model is more accurate than the finite difference method since it takes into account the finite thickness of the groundwater table. Features Ramp models are built from a 2D domain that can be rectangular, elliptical or triangular. The domain can either be structured or unstructured. Unstructured model: The unstructured ramp model is based on a semi-permeable hydraulic-geophysical continuum, including the well system. Groundwater is forced into the system by a steady source and is allowed to flow through the hydraulic conductivity field and the well system into the stratum below. Structured model: A structured ramp model uses a regular grid to divide the domain into cells, and each cell is associated with an individual driving point. The time-dependent driving potential to each cell is calculated according to Darcy's law.
