Q: "Initializer element is not constant" when building C++ with Visual Studio 2010 I am trying to learn C++ on a Mac. I am trying to build the following code: `#include struct Foo { int start; int stop; }; void test(Foo& foo, int x, int y) { // Here is the function if (x == foo.start && y == foo.stop) foo.stop = y; } int main() { // Variables, here. int x = 30, y = 30; Foo foo; test(foo, x, y); // Here's something else. x = 10; foo.stop = y; } But I get the following compiler error: error C2451: 'Foo::start' : initializer element is not constant I'm using the code with the following configuration: MSVC Version: 10.0.40219.1 Language: C++ Configuration: Native GNU C++ Compiler (/MD) A: You are trying to use Foo's start and stop members when the compiler can't possibly know them. They are not objects and therefore must be initialized, but without the name of the constructor. The initializer for a member function must use a full-form argument list, so you need to use: Foo foo{.start = x,.stop = y}; Technical Field The present disclosure relates generally to computer-aided design/manufacturing (CAD/CAM) systems and, more particularly, to surface model (or mesh) operations performed in such systems. Background Discussion In conventional CAD/CAM systems, there are typically different regions of a surface or mesh model that are split between two processes, e.g., surface/mesh calculation for some operations on the surface model and modeling for other operations on the surface model. Such splitting of the process could lead to inefficient system operation and/or a high processing overhead because of usage of expensive system hardware, software and/or firmware and/or prolonged system processing time. But in`
