Q: ASP.NET Core - Refresh route cache during development During development, we use the site without caching enabled. If a route is refreshed, the cache is rebuilt and everything works fine. But when the route cache is refreshed for example for a recompiling of the code, suddenly the routedata seems to be cached. The solution is to rebuild the cache: But it is rather slow and inconvenient. Is there a way to force the cache refresh during run-time or change some configuration during development. A: There is an IApplicationBuilder extension method that can force the cache to refresh by calling EnsureInitializedAsync: public static class HttpContextExtensions { public static IApplicationBuilder UseDeveloperFolder(this IApplicationBuilder builder) { return builder.UseDeveloperExceptionPage(); } public static IApplicationBuilder UseDeveloperExceptionPage(this IApplicationBuilder builder) { return builder.UseExceptionHandler(builder.ApplicationServices.GetService().ApplicationInsightsExceptionHandler); } public static IApplicationBuilder UseRelativePath(this IApplicationBuilder builder) { return builder.UseStartup(); } public static IApplicationBuilder UseRelativePath(this IApplicationBuilder builder, IConfigurationSource configSource) { var serviceCollection = builder.ApplicationServices.GetService(); if (serviceCollection.HostingEnvironment.IsDevelopment()) {

Product review by Rick Huggins on 10/06/2004, 09:07 PM I am a web developer and have been doing freelance work off and on for many years. I needed a solution to send faxes from my laptop to my desktop fax machine that I have offsite. There were many programs out there but none of them were as easy to use as Fax by Modem. It worked as advertised and let me do more important things while still being able to send and receive faxes using my laptop and desktop. I will recommend Fax by Modem to any business that has a fax machine and wants to have it on a web page.
