Add cool weather quotes, joking fortunes, or other small truths, funny scripts or personalized signature tools into all of your emails with WeatherSig. Use different language settings for multiple cities to switch the signature automatically to the one you want to use in a group of emails. A recent survey of more than 500 MBA students found that 77% of business school grads know someone who expects to be promoted, cited promotion as the reason they applied to business school. The last few years have been challenging for the business world. Tough economic times mean everyone has been affected and many businesses are struggling to survive. So when the moment comes to promote a company employee, it's important to take a fresh look at some well-known marketing techniques that have been proven to work for decades. And more often than not, personal connections may play a role in the process. While much of the promotional process involves sending out e-mails to thousands of people, people also receive tons of personal messages every day. These messages give companies a personal touch that may help them stand out from the rest. Considering you're already spending so much time with your employees, why not use it to your advantage? Here are seven relationship-based promotional techniques that are sure to give your company's marketing a boost. Throw in some video. With all of the potential that the web offers, it's hard to find a niche that doesn't have a video attached to it. Furthermore, even if a company's goal isn't video per se, many business managers are inherently drawn to video. Imagine a company that video'd its employees talking about their jobs. You know, the higher up the corporate ladder the employees go, the more internal their insights are, the more video they'd produce. It also helps that video is easy to use for anyone. All you need to do is upload a clip or create a reel on your own. From there, pretty much anyone can post the video, including customers and potential customers. Video's reach is vast. On YouTube alone, there's an estimated 500,000 hours of video posted every minute. But while the prospect of people who are interested in what you're saying might seem far-reaching, they often lead to follow-up questions and get closer to decision-making. So if you've got a good video you want people to see, why not share it with others? Use social media. We've all seen the ads for SEO and PPC. They try to make the idea sound super easy,
