Adobe Photoshop is available for Windows and Mac platforms. Learn Photoshop online and download the software for free. What is Photoshop Photoshop is a layered editing tool created by Adobe Systems to be used by professionals and amateurs alike. What makes this tool different from other image editing programs such as Photoshop Elements is that it was specifically designed to work with raster images (bitmap images) rather than vector images (line-based images). While many image editing software programs are built to work with many different types of images, including photos, vector graphics, painting, or slideshows, Photoshop was designed to edit raster images, which are commonly used by professionals in the graphic and design industries. This is a key difference from other image editing programs that were originally designed for simple photo editing. Photoshop, on the other hand, is a tool used to edit not just photos, but any type of digital image. Image Processing Adobe Photoshop consists of a program with a great deal of functionality that requires a bit of learning. It has a history of being somewhat complex, which often led many people to use a simpler image editing program, even when Photoshop can do everything they need. Photoshop is based on the principle of image processing, which is the process of manipulating images to accomplish some goal, often a final product. For example, you may want to convert a photo into a video, or you may want to retouch an image. What's an Image? A digital image is composed of a grid of pixels. Each pixel is a tiny square of light or dark on the monitor, and when you make an image, your computer simply creates an arrangement of pixels. A pixel is a dot of color on the surface of the monitor that represents a light or dark dot on the photo. A pixel may be red, green, or blue, but it can be any color, just as a photo can be taken in any color. When it comes to images created on a computer, it's important to understand what color is. Each color is actually composed of tiny segments of red, green, and blue. When you see an image on your monitor, the red, green, and blue components of each pixel are the colors that make up the image. Photoshop Uses Layers When you work with Photoshop, you will be using the layers that you created to begin editing your image. These layers help you organize your work to the

The present invention relates to an apparatus for severing continuous webs of wrapping film, and more particularly, to such an apparatus wherein the film is slit or cut to produce a single web of desired length, and wherein an automatic centering and registration system is provided for transversely aligning the web with respect to a cutter blade. Various wrapping machines are known in the art for providing a wrapper web around a package or the like. These are typically used in a packaging operation in which a web of film is slit to form a web of desired length. The wrapper is then loaded onto a platen of a packaging machine such as a machine used to form a container for softdrinks, paper cups, and the like. The platen advances the web to a wrapping station where the ends of the web are adhered to the package. The ends of the film are adhered to the package by means of heated rollers, for example. The heated rollers melt the ends of the web of film to fuse the ends of the film to the package. The operator of a wrapping machine is in a high degree of jeopardy during operation of the machine. Not only is it essential that the operator maintain a vigilant eye on the web of film being fed through the machine, the operator must be able to ensure that the film is accurately aligned over the cutting element or cutter blade of the machine. The operator must make certain that the film is accurately centered about the cutter blade to insure that the film is cut properly, thereby eliminating any gap between the film and the outer surface of the package. The packaging machine may be used on low speed, high-volume production lines, and the speed of the production line may vary from a minimum speed of 30 seconds per package to a maximum of 20 seconds per package. During the production of packages at the highest speeds, it is important that the web of film be accurately centered and accurately cut in order to minimize downtime and maximize production of packages. Various attempts have been made to improve the quality of wrapping films, and to minimize the machine set-up time and operating time. U.S. Pat. No. 5,749,648 to Roth et al. discloses a wrapping system having a web roll magazine, a take-up spool, and a slitter for slitting the web into one or more webs. A registration system is disclosed which moves a registration member in spaced relationship to the slitter and determines the correct web position for contacting the cutter. A cutting apparatus cuts the web and a

Q: Singleton and constructors I currently see two different approaches to get a singleton. As far as I see, these both work well. The first approach is: `Singleton.singleton = Singleton.singleton();` The second approach is: `Singleton.singleton = new Singleton();` In short, which approach is better, and why? Is there a better approach? A: The first approach does not work because you are assigning the result of the call to the field by value: `Singleton.singleton = Singleton.singleton();` While the second approach works, because you are storing a reference to the object you created and can reuse it. (this is so called by reference semantics of the variable, and only works for objects that have a proper constructor with a reference to self argument). A: Generally speaking, an instance of a Singleton will live as long as there is at least one class that wants to use it. There are some drawbacks to that, but it's ideal for application-level singletons. Consider the following simple example: `public class SingletonExample { private static Singleton _instance; public static Singleton instance { get { if (_instance == null) { _instance = new Singleton(); } return _instance; } } private Singleton() {} }` This is a trivial example, but it demonstrates the main point of a singleton - the Singleton class knows about itself, and so the instance of the Singleton class can be created from the class itself. The drawback is
