Advances in recent years have led to the digital evolution of photography. Illustration techniques have moved from pen and ink and watercolor to Photoshop as a means of artistic expression and to improve the design of a photograph. Photoshop is the state-of-the-art software used to create these designs and works.

Photoshop is an essential software for photo editing. It is a combination of image editing and photo manipulation software. Photoshop is divided into layers and each layer is assigned a certain property, such as color, brightness, contrast, etc. Photoshop layers can be moved, scaled, rotated, and connected to each other to create any desired design. Which Photoshop file formats should I use for my designs? Photoshop's three most common file formats are PSD, PNG, and GIF. PNG: Photoshop can save your artwork in two types of PNG files, compressed and uncompressed. The two file types are standard and extended format. The standard format file format is identical to the original image and is compressed using the deflate algorithm. The extended format PNG file can expand to encompass more than an original image, and includes two additional alpha channel attributes. As such, these files need to have a much larger file size than the standard format. If you are considering saving as a PNG file, you should first check the size of your image for the ultimate file size. Since a PNG file is compressed, it can save 10-20 times your original image size. Source: psdmartin.com PSD: Photoshop's native file format is known as PSD. PSD is designed for creating and editing images. The data inside the PSD file can be changed and updated in the future without losing the original structure. One of the most important reasons to use PSD format is the fast editing function. You can move and resize your layers without losing any of your data. Drawing with Photoshop is based on layers, which means that you can keep the original image untouched by moving, resizing, or rotating any of the layers. As opposed to a typical image, the PSD layer's settings are not affected when a new layer is added to the top of
