If you don't have one yet, you're out of luck.[Doppler indices in acute myocardial infarction]. The significance of Doppler indices in detecting acute myocardial infarction is still in discussion. The aim of the study was to test and compare Doppler indices and ST-segment elevation on admission in patients with myocardial infarction with respect to its extent and the presence of early arrhythmias. In a prospective study, 61 patients with acute myocardial infarction were examined. Doppler indices were measured: peak diastolic flow velocity (EDFV), time-averaged maximum velocity (TAMXV), resistance index (RI) and pulsatility index (PI). ST-segment elevation was measured in leads V5, V6, V7 and V8, and ST/QT-interval in all patients. EDFV was increased in all patients with myocardial infarction. TAMXV was increased in all subgroups of patients with myocardial infarction (with and without angiographic visible coronary atherosclerosis), in patients with and without STEMI. TIMAXV was correlated with peak systolic blood pressure. EDFF was correlated with ST elevation in V5, and average ST elevation was correlated with TAMXV. TI MYMAXV was correlated with EDFV in patients with myocardial infarction without angiographic visible coronary atherosclerosis. EDFV was decreased in patients with myocardial infarction and early ventricular arrhythmias. EDFF was increased in patients with myocardial infarction and ST elevation on admission. In these patients EDFV was the best Doppler index for identification of myocardial infarction.*If you would like a passport cover to match your customized passport, please contact us so we can order it for you.
