We never see him put on his clothes after he is pulled through the vortex. The Doctor's whereabouts seem to imply that he's been there for a long time, perhaps forever, but how does he explain this? A: When the Doctor goes to get out of his windbreak, he removes his jacket. The words that follow aren't spoken (at least not by him) so I don't know for certain if he gives the reason then. But from one of the commentaries, he says that he was wearing them since the New World was created. The show runners are planning on further on in the time-line saying But the TARDIS isn't a land-line phone, it only works on the telephone network, you see. So we never made it to the New World, did we? We had to find something else. In this case, we found the Time stream going backwards. Except the Time Lords were there, too, and that's what started the war. That's why the moon is a Dead World, that's why the universe is dying. And I've brought it all back, I've brought it all back with me. So he gave this as the rationale for his clothes at the time that the first episode takes place. There's also a comment from Matt Smith, I think, or a British one at least that says something like He was wearing the clothes when he got back from the Earth-like planet and according to the TARDIS's memory, he had never worn them before (the Doctor 'already had them with him' when he left the Earth
