Aquatic Insect Phototactic Behavior in Underwater Traps Created with Electrochemical Microscopy. Insects are highly attracted to light; therefore, aquatic macroinvertebrates are sensitive to changes in light intensity and wavelengths. I used electrochemical microscopy (ECM) to study the light-irradiance responses of aquatic insects under natural and artificial (Baldwin trap) conditions. All the aquatic insects tested exhibited phototactic behavior when trapped in open water in a pressure chamber. There was a significant difference in the magnitude of their initial light response under natural and artificial conditions. All the aquatic insects tested responded positively to light intensities of 25 lux and were attracted to red and violet light when stimulated with small light sources at 25 to 50 lux. In addition, all aquatic insects tested were attracted to green light, which is an important factor to consider when using ECM for aquatic insect surveys, as green light penetrates more effectively to underwater structures. The results of this study provide a framework for future studies on the behavioral responses of aquatic insects in response to light and the evaluation of the potential ecological impacts of artificial light sources on aquatic ecosystems.
