The present invention relates to a semiconductor device including a semiconductor element such as a transistor. For example, the present invention relates to a power device which is mounted on a power supply circuit of a home electric appliance or the like. A power device includes a semiconductor element such as a metal oxide semiconductor field effect transistor (MOSFET) and a bipolar transistor. As a power device, Japanese Unexamined Patent Application Publication No. 2007-57962 (Patent Document 1) discloses a vertical MOSFET in which an n-type base region is provided under a p-type body region. In this vertical MOSFET, a gate electrode is provided above the body region in a vertical direction. The vertical MOSFET has an advantage in that it has a reduction in the on resistance. However, in a process in which the MOSFET is manufactured, at least two photolithography processes are required. Thus, in view of the manufacturing process, it is desirable to suppress an increase in the number of photolithography processes in order to reduce the manufacturing cost.

What's New In?

The present invention relates to computer software and, more particularly, to a technique for providing a new, improved, and useful instructional game within a computer environment. Presently, computer and video games, in the form of educational games, include games that may provide a user with an opportunity to obtain bonus points, educational material, or educational assistance. Such games, however, provide only static viewing of static images. Furthermore, such games do not provide instruction to a user on how to use a feature of the game or how to interact with the game in a manner that improves the user's ability to play the game. Providing educational content on a game is advantageous to the game manufacturers as they can gain a new market of users for their products. By adding educational content to their games, users can learn to play the game with a clear appreciation and understanding of the basic gameplay features and controls of the game, and with an ability to use those features of the game to a maximum degree. This, in turn, will increase the user's enjoyment of the game, with or without the assistance of educational content. Furthermore, by providing a simple, clear means of sharing the educational content, game manufacturers may attract game users who would otherwise not consider playing the games for educational purposes. Game instruction is also beneficial to game developers as it enables the developers to create a game that is suitable for the educational audience for which it is intended. This, in turn, may avoid the time and expense of developing a game for the instructional market that is poorly suited to that market due to its overly complicated or unrealistic features. Furthermore, game developers benefit from providing educational content as it helps to reduce the number of errors and defective games that are created and released into the public market. There is a need for a technique for providing a new, improved, and useful instructional game within a computer environment that has a greater degree of interactivity with users, and that is better suited to produce, to create, and to share, a
