One hundred and fifty-six children aged 0-14 years old from a rural area in Tanzania were studied to assess the incidence of fractures and the risk factors in this population. Cases were recruited through random selection of households and of all children between the ages of one and 14 years attending the Tamale Teaching Hospital paediatric fracture clinic. The prevalence of fractures was 12.2 per 100 in children between six and 14 years, and was highest in girls in the first decade of life. Eighty-five percent of all fractures were of a lower limb (83.7%), and the most common type of fracture was fracture of the distal radius. Among the risk factors, only female gender and malnutrition were significant in univariate analyses. No association was found between risk factors and epidemiological characteristics in a univariate analysis. The prevalence of fractures in children in rural Tanzania is high. The incidence of fractures in children was also high, and the factors associated with them appeared to be similar to those in other reports in developed countries. This suggests that children in Tanzania, as in other sub-Saharan countries, remain at high risk of fractures, and that there may be ethnic factors that predispose people to fractures.
