During a two-year pot trial, maize was given two additional plant protection compounds, the leaf-stripping herbicide glyphosate and the application of Beauveria sp. X10-14. The efficacy of these measures was assessed in comparison with a standard soil regime in an insect-infested area of Bavaria, Germany. The number and composition of soil microorganisms were determined on different substrate layers and sampled by means of air-liftable slides at the end of the experiment. Three quadrats were investigated for each point of the substrate. The insect-specific treated plants had a four times lower consumption rate of maize than the untreated controls. This was accompanied by an increased diversity of soil micro-flora. For example, the number of Actinomycetes was b7e8fdf5c8

I live in Europe (Switzerland) and it is nice to have the choice between high and low tax rates, there were discussions in the last hours of the coalition negotiations of the "winner take all" scenario (projection of the new government from the first day), but luckily it got rejected. Nonetheless, I have some problems with tax havens, not with people who use one. The problem is that the police should track down those people who pull off tax frauds, not vice versa. I don't understand why anybody would need to use a lot of complicated tax strategies to save a little tax. It's a legitimate tax break. However, I guess if you're trying to dodge taxes, it's not ok to use a lot of different strategies for a lot of countries you're doing business with. As far as Switzerland goes, it has more stringent and complicated rules than other countries. With some rare exceptions they will not let you do a real business within their borders. The government makes it clear you must do a real business within their borders so that they can better control you. Those that are well connected have endless opportunities to get around the rules if they are clever enough. If they don't they might get caught by the police. I think the issue here is people doing the right thing, but in a roundabout way. A lot of people are taxed in a "percentage", they don't pay based on the sum of money they make, but on a percentage of that sum
