The motion capture was performed at the Photon Dynamics studio in London, and was led by Dr Alex Harley, who has assisted in the development of the players' animations for the past 15 years for the FIFA series. Here, Alex Harley explains how the HyperMotion Technology will impact players, clubs and, ultimately, the game of football. Let's start with a question. Why did you decide to focus on motion capture in Fifa 22 Crack? We've been working on the HyperMotion Technology for the past three years at GIANTS Software. We had already done motion capture for free kicks, set-pieces and goalkeepers as part of FIFA 15's The Journey - which brought in significant technology advancements as part of the main gameplay engine - but not for the players. With FIFA 17, we were able to bring in the most realistic player animations we'd ever created. Motion capture helped us do that, but we were still limited because we only had one motion capture suit that was designed for a single player. So we decided to take the next step in the game development cycle and try to create a completely new one. It was clear that it wouldn't be easy because the motion capture suits were made for a specific player profile. The suits were created by a sports scientists in Germany, which was fine, but when we asked the player to pose in the motion capture studio, he would just lie there, and the motion capture engine couldn't record any more data. It was a bit frustrating, so we decided to move the process to a motion capture studio in London, which was a bit larger. We put on about four different suits - one for each player profile - and then had three or four professional players playing a complete full-intensity football match. This enabled us to collect a massive amount of data - more than 40,000 frames - and also refined all the player data and animations. This was the first time that player motion was captured on such a large scale, and it enabled us to create a much more realistic player model with much more realistic animations. We brought the quality to a completely different level. The results made us realise that we could make it work for every player profile. We were able to work with 22 player profiles, and also make it a really comprehensive technology, bringing more realism to all the player animations and context-based reactions. The
