In particular, the present invention relates to the monitoring of baghouse filters used for entrapping particulate matter in an exhaust stream. Baghouse filters include a housing, a fine mesh filter media supported by the housing, a coarse filter media supported by the housing for attenuating debris above the fine filter media, and air flow openings in the housing for allowing air to flow from outside into the housing and to flow out of the housing. The filter media is typically a cylindrical filter medium comprising a number of pleated bags, each being formed from a pleat formed on a flat sheet. The pleat is formed by folding the flat sheet in half, and thereafter stitching the folded areas together. In such pleated bags, the filter medium may typically be supported between a pair of annular filter support plates. The filter media and the support plates are assembled with a glue-like material to form a substantially rigid structure. A discharge port is formed in the housing and extends circumferentially about the housing for allowing filtered air to exit the baghouse filter. In some baghouses, the discharge port is formed in one of the filter support plates. In other baghouses, the discharge port is formed in the housing. The baghouse filter is typically mounted within a housing or duct. The exhaust air flowing into the housing passes through the housing and through the baghouse filter to the filter discharge port. Inside the housing, the exhaust air b7e8fd5c8

The present invention generally relates to a method for the manufacture of a semiconductor device, and more specifically to a method for forming a bump electrode on a semiconductor substrate. Recent trends in the semiconductor industry are to downsize the semiconductor devices and to increase the amount of data processed by the semiconductor devices. The downsize of the semiconductor devices causes many problems. For example, a so-called "pitch" becomes finer along with the downsize of the semiconductor devices. As a result of the increasing degree of integration of the semiconductor devices, the number of electrodes arranged on a chip is also increasing. Along with the increase in the number of electrodes, the number of the bumps arranged on the chip is also increasing. An assembly method employing, for example, a solder is a well-known technique for connecting the electrodes of a substrate to the electrodes of a chip. FIG. 1 is a sectional view illustrating a semiconductor device according to the related art. Referring to FIG. 1, the related art semiconductor device 200
