Stress and academic performance in South African grade seven students. A cross-sectional survey was conducted in five high schools in the Limpopo Province to determine whether academic performance was related to academic stress, as measured by the Coping Inventory for Stressful Situations (CISS). The questionnaire was administered to 330 grade seven students, who completed it anonymously. The proportion of males and females was 61% and 39%, respectively. Sixty percent of the students reported that they were dissatisfied with their school. The highest proportion of students reporting academic stress was from Cape Town, the largest city in the province. The CISS scores of the students were considerably higher than those reported by non-resident students studying in other provinces. A substantial proportion of the students reported that they avoided home activities at school because of academic stress. Reported CISS scores were significantly higher in the Cape Town group. It was concluded that the magnitude of academic stress in South African schools was higher than in other countries studied. It was recommended that an all-school academic policy be introduced in the schools, while a continuing educational programme should be implemented in the schools. The CISS appeared to be a viable instrument for use in a South African population, but it may have been too simplistic for the Cape Town sample.

Free prostate health seminars throughout the country — from Alaska to Georgia — have made cancer awareness a hot topic of conversation among men. And that means some males have questions about the best way to prevent prostate cancer. When it comes to a certain question, there is no "one size fits all" answer. Jeffrey Goldstein, M.D., chief medical officer and vice president of the Urology Institute of New York, will be conducting four seminars on this topic this month in New York, Miami, Charlotte and Albuquerque. The national initiative is part of the American Urological Association's "Free the Prostate" campaign, and is presented by the New York Urology Group, which is sponsored by Abbott Laboratories, among other companies. Advertisement "In the last seven years, the incidence of prostate cancer has doubled," said Dr. Goldstein, a practicing urologist who specializes in the prostate. "Men are getting older and the risk factors continue. It's the number one cancer in the country." "The message of the campaign is that we must fight back against increasing rates of prostate cancer," he said. Meanwhile, men are treated earlier and earlier for smaller cancers; new drugs are helping

The identification of markers of female infertility is currently an area of intense investigation in the world of reproductive medicine. Studies of proteins, enzymes, hormones, and immune factors are all being carried out with the aim of being able to predict the success of the different therapeutic options. This paper reviews the current knowledge regarding the identification of biomarkers of infertility and their physiological mechanisms in the female. Protein-based markers of female infertility have been the most studied thus far. It has become apparent that the measurement of proteins at different stages of the menstrual cycle can help in the identification of potential markers of infertility. In the female reproductive system, proteomics can be very useful in the recognition of fertile and infertile phases as well as the prediction of ovulation. At present, protein-based markers of infertility in women are not of great clinical value. However, protein-based measurements are becoming more and more important for the improvement of IVF and the diagnosis of poor responders in vitro fertilization. When examining the menstrual cycle and the success rate of treatments, the measurement of biomarkers might be useful in the choice of fertility treatment for a given patient. The development of new proteomic techniques for the identification of specific biomarkers could help in the early prediction of infertility and the identification of the appropriate treatment for each patient.
