FEATURES:Abstract: The bacterial CRISPR/Cas system provides immunity against viruses and plasmids that contaminate both cultured and wild strains of bacteria. The spacer sequences of the CRISPR/Cas memory are acquired from foreign DNA, and provide prokaryotic recipients with immunity. This biological defense is highly adaptive, and its modular, complex architecture makes it challenging to decipher. Here, we analyze the structure of CRISPR/Cas9 immunity in Streptococcus thermophilus, a dairy-spreading Streptococcus species. Using bioinformatics and genomic approaches, we identified the CRISPR/Cas9 array and spacers in S. thermophilus. Our analysis of the leader-proximal spacer sequences indicates a striking similarity to foreign DNA, indicating that these sequences may be acquired from its environment. However, sequences from a strain-specific spacers were detected. Such specificity in the acquired repertoire indicates that the immunity function is directed against a specific source of foreign DNA. Altogether, these results suggest that the CRISPR/Cas9 system has evolved to discriminate between foreign and beneficial genetic elements, but not between environmental bacteria. The authors have no financial interests to declare. The findings and conclusions in this article are those of the author(s)
