Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a stabilizer apparatus for a vehicle, in particular, a stabilizer apparatus that is configured so that a vehicle can be stably driven while absorbing load fluctuations from the ground. Description of Related Art The applicant of the present invention has developed a stabilizer apparatus that includes an air spring having a cylindrical air chamber, and a first piston that is attached to the wheel, and a second piston that is attached to the vehicle body, and that is configured so that both of these pistons are movable in a vertical direction relative to the air chamber. In particular, the applicant of the present invention has developed a stabilizer apparatus in which a partition wall is inserted into the air chamber and along the vertical direction of the air chamber, and in which an arc shape is formed on the side of the piston facing the partition wall, so that the arc shape is formed as a virtual link having a gap therebetween along the vertical direction, and the gap is made to change in the vertical direction. Further, the applicant of the present invention has developed a stabilizer apparatus in which one of a plurality of discrete change portions (first change portions) is arranged on the side of the partition wall facing the piston, so that the plurality of the discrete change portions are linked to each other to change the vertical position thereof. The applicant of the present invention has further developed a stabilizer apparatus in which a seal section that seals the gap between the outer circumferential surface of the piston and the inner circumferential surface of the air chamber is provided on the part of the cylindrical air chamber into which the piston is inserted. A stabilizer apparatus is disclosed in JP 2010-191465A that includes a piston that is attached to the wheel side of the vehicle and is configured so that it is movable in a vertical direction relative to a cylindrical air chamber. A second piston that is attached to the vehicle body side is inserted into the air chamber, and the second piston is configured so that it is movable in the vertical direction relative to the air chamber. The apparatus includes plural partition walls, and arc shapes are formed on the side of the piston facing the partition wall, so that a virtual link having a gap therebetween along the vertical direction is formed, and the gap is made to change in the vertical direction. In particular, each partition wall includes a first change portion that moves in the vertical direction of the first piston in the same phase as the second piston, and

Blogging This is a forum for our members and friends to exchange and share ideas and current events in the fields of radiology, nuclear medicine, nuclear cardiology, and oncology. Archives Listed below are the archived posts since the beginning of this blog. Post navigation Nuclear medicine greets The term “nuclear medicine” comes from the Greek roots, and means the “discovery of the secretions of the body.” The roots of the term may have been linked to the term “nascent science”, meaning “to see the invisible.” Perhaps the high level of secrecy around the atom and nuclear science are among the reasons that the term was applied to the use of radionuclides as a means of investigating the body for abnormalities and disease. Nuclear medicine had a great impact on the discovery of a wide variety of diseases, and contributed in a great many ways to our understanding of biology and biochemistry, brain and skeletal muscle chemistry and function, and the etiology of a wide variety of disease processes, and the development of clinical guidelines for diagnosis and management. While clinical nuclear medicine has experienced a decline in recent years due to the availability of other imaging modalities, such as MRI, CT, ultrasound, PET, and scintigraphy, the contributions of nuclear medicine to the foundation of modern medicine cannot be overstated. While in some respects, nuclear medicine became entrenched as a subspecialty of radiology, it was not initially organized and structured as such. From its beginnings with the study of thyroid physiology in 1946, nuclear medicine has been closely linked to the broader discipline of medicine. Medical nuclear medicine was established as a recognized subspecialty in the 1960s. It received its own College of American Pathologists (CAP) certification in 1969, and its own Society of Nuclear Medicine (SNM) certification in 1988. The field was led by nuclear physicians in the United States until it was challenged by the newly established field of nuclear cardiology. This is discussed further below. At the time of its inception, the development of nuclear medicine was linked to the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission, led by Dr. Morris "Doc" Scharff, and his colleagues. The major focus of the group was the study of the physiology and biochemistry of the thyroid gland. The techniques and instrumentation used in this early work were tailored to the nuclear work.
