They are called ctenophores. In their most recent research, published today in the journal Current Biology, the team of researchers, from the universities of Göttingen and Gothenburg, describes a completely new group of animals, and demonstrate that they are not just a different type of animal to other invertebrates such as jellyfish and mollusks. The creatures, which are comprised of hundreds of cells and resemble jellyfish, are not known to have a spine, a head, a brain, a stomach, a gut, a heart or any other of the typical organs and structures that many people think of when they think of life forms. Professor Arne Knerr, from the Department of Biochemistry, at the University of Gothenburg, said: "The ctenophores are a completely new animal group, with no known predecessors in the sea
