“What is new in FIFA 19 was the level of nuance in movements,” EA Sports Senior Producer Steve Nicol explains. “We wanted to show that it’s not just how far an athlete moves, but also how they move.” “Because FIFA is already the most realistic football game, we were thinking about how we could really drill down to details that would make it more believable. When you’re having a conversation in a stadium, you have a few people that really stand out. One of those people is your hero and another person that your entire team focuses on,” Nicol adds. “That was one of the things that we really wanted to showcase with HyperMotion is that these guys move in a specific way.”

“When we play FIFA in the city, we see these moments and they don’t feel unnatural,” Nicol continues. “They feel like they were written into the football game as if these characters were in a real stadium. HyperMotion technology takes that a step further by helping to recreate some of those moments.” Microsoft Game Studios, Quality Assurance Director Shannon Loftis, Technical Director Mark MacDonald, and Technical Director Matthew Yee have been working on the game since FIFA 19. They also worked on FIFA 17 and have helped mentor Ubisoft’s David Sanchez, who now leads an EA Sports-led team of engineers working on HyperMotion. This year’s build, code-named “Machinima” and launched in October, added prototyped players on the field who can accept quick-time-based actions to “follow” the ball, react to a pass, or react to the dribbling of teammates. “Instead of characters wandering around like in the past, they are really affecting how the game plays,” Loftis says. “It’s absolutely a game-changer.” One of the most noticeable changes to game mechanics involves A.I. “Teammates have sped up their ability to fall back,” Loftis says. “It’s an almost 100 percent improvement. They can better sense when a pass will be made, they can anticipate when a pass should be made and make decisions based on past and present.” “How do players recognize when to attack, how do they anticipate the direction of runs, how
