"We're looking at the next era of football video game physics," said Matt Tolzmann, director of product management at EA Sports. "Our goal was to create the world's most realistic and authentic football video game. And we didn't just want to make a game that did a good job of recreating the real-world physics of football. We wanted to make a game that was truly authentic. Through research, player tracking data and crowd analysis data, we've been able to curate the most accurate player models, physics engine and authentic ball physics to deliver a truly authentic and complete video game experience for players of all skill levels." The idea behind HyperMotion was to blend all of the available real-life player and ball tracking data from a single, high-intensity game together to create a complete game universe. The technology is available to all players in order to take advantage of the unique opportunity to experience the game with just such a complete 360° view. "Creating this technology was a huge undertaking," said Earl Wamsley, senior producer of FIFA 22. "The data is never-ending and we've had the fortune of having access to thousands of hours of data from a variety of different sources, from real-world players, to RealPlayer, to Testpilot for Xbox One and from the Steam version of the game. We've worked closely with Premier League, so we've been able to tap into a treasure trove of data, but we also have had access to plenty of data from the previous FIFA games. We've even gone back and looked at high-intensity, high-speed cameras used for filming for broadcast. It's a really big undertaking to pull all of that data together to make a game that is as authentic as possible." Numerous artificial intelligence (AI) improvements have been implemented throughout the game. In particular, the return of the Trajectory AI using Trajectory Formation, Trajectory Traversal and Zonal Pressure. Players will now track their attacks more effectively and intelligently time when to break away from their opponent in order to make a surprise interception. Trajectory Formation will now be employed in order to make smarter decisions about the areas of the pitch a player should look for space within. Each formation will provide the appropriate pressure and width for that area of the pitch. Traject
