It is spelled with a "w" in the early US records and the UK. Questpond is a pronoun in Russian, the It also has a similar use to "Yquest, who could be a he or a she. The word started to be used in print after the English-speaking world had taken up the use of question and answer sentences. Questpond is etymologically connected to the words quest and pond. It is a form of quest for; the word is used in several other languages: in Russian, for example, quest is spelled kneer (kvest) and the pronoun kro (kto). Kro (kto) and kneer (kvest) are both based on the Proto-Slavic root *kř- (compare Proto-Italic *krito, Lat *quest, --). The word is used in a similar way in some forms of German: zu quechten meaning to question, to investigate and in some of the nonstandard dialects to pester, to harass and in many varieties of Dutch to ask, to question, to seek for, to be doubtful about; the word is also used in Yiddish, often with the (informal) meaning of "to chase". The word is borrowed by some other Germanic languages, including English, Danish and Icelandic, which use it with the meaning of "to ask (about something)". It is used in the Dutch language as a colloquial term to ask someone a question and it is one of the 16 native verbs of that language. In Polish it means to ask someone to do something. This use is common also in Dutch and in Hungarian where it means to ask for something or in the case of kids to ask for a toy or other thing they have to have. In Czech, Ukrainian, Slovak, Bulgarian and Slovenian the word question-answer and question-answer are written the same way, but pronounced differently. "Question-answer" is spoken as two separate words in Slavic languages. In several Slavic languages question-answer is a compound verb with a special meaning, e. g. the Russian word for a question
