The high prevalence of diabetes and its associated vascular complications makes it imperative to evaluate innovative health care interventions to improve diabetes outcomes and reduce costs. This study evaluated the cost and cost-effectiveness of a telemonitoring system compared to usual care for adults with type 2 diabetes and their diabetes providers. This study was a randomized clinical trial using a health-economic evaluation at 13 community clinics. A total of 127 adults with type 2 diabetes, recruited from the primary care practice, were assigned to either the telemonitoring intervention or usual care group. The intervention group received continuous telemonitoring of blood glucose and blood pressure three times per week by real-time telephone for 30 weeks, whereas the control group received usual care. The primary outcome was the difference in health care resource utilization between the groups, including costs and outcomes measured at baseline, week 8, and week 30. Three-month clinical outcomes were assessed using participants' medical charts. A cost-effectiveness analysis compared the intervention with usual care by estimating costs per quality-adjusted life-year and cost-effectiveness for the intervention group based on the cost per quality-adjusted life-year saved. Telemonitoring was more effective than usual care in decreasing average daily blood glucose and systolic blood pressure. Telemonitoring resulted in lower utilization of inpatient hospitalization (mean difference, $1350; 95% CI, $-1211 to $3771), emergency room visits (mean difference, $575; 95% CI, $-
