RAW Files The RAW format is a common file format for digital cameras. If you shoot in RAW mode, the image is unedited. Instead of converting the image to another format, such as JPEG, you save it in its native format. The reason to shoot in RAW mode is that you can choose to only capture the data that is necessary for the image in the file itself, which allows you to capture more light and capture better images than you can with JPEGs. The raw format is a far larger file type than a JPEG image, although this size becomes smaller when you convert it to another file format such as JPEG. RAW files require that you have at least a 50-megabyte hard drive on which to store them. Fortunately, you can now purchase a RAW software program or camera that automatically converts the image to a new format for you, saving you the trouble of doing so manually. * The Lomography Color Negative Film: www.lomography.com/cameras/lomo-color-negative-film/ * Adobe Photoshop Elements: www.adobe.com/in/products/photoshop_elements/ * Apple iPhoto: www.apple.com/ipad/itunes/images/photoshop.html * Apple iMovie: www.apple.com/ipad/itunes/video/imovie.html * Apple iDVD: www.apple.com/ipad/itunes/video/dvd.html
