""""".After a six-week hiatus, Facebook is rolling back some of its privacy changes to make it easier for people to see when their activities are being tracked. The company began rolling back some of its privacy changes on Monday in an effort to make your data visible to other people and visible to Facebook — even if you're not logged in. The changes are being made in response to the company's $22 billion acquisition of the WhatsApp messaging app. On Monday, Facebook began turning off the cloaking effect. This means that people can no longer opt-out of seeing whether their friends are tagging them in a photo or if they have read a status update when you're not logged in. Facebook also started making it easier to see the content of your friends' posts and comments — like when they post a photo of you, for example. "We know that making these changes will mean people will have to log in more often, and that's why we've made the changes so that people still know when they are being tracked,” Facebook product director Mike Isaac in a post. “We want to make sure people get more control over who can see what they post. We understand that this won't always be the ideal situation, but these changes should help everyone.” The changes will not impact everyone — only about 700 million Facebook users — and only people who are logged into their accounts. The company’s goal is to make sure users are always aware of when their data is being used and shared on the platform.
