Comparison of methods to determine cut-points for endotoxin activity based on a survival model in endotoxemic and healthy rats. Many commercial kits are available for endotoxin activity measurements. It is important to determine the endotoxin activity to evaluate the risk of sepsis due to endotoxin contamination. To evaluate endotoxin activity using different protocols, we compared endotoxin activity in endotoxin and healthy rat serum using various methods. Endotoxin activity in endotoxin serum samples was also determined using five kits and an in vitro assay. The most sensitive assay in endotoxin serum samples was the chromogenic limulus amoebocyte lysate method. Endotoxin activity in endotoxin and healthy rat serum was not significantly different. The minimal detectable activity by LAL was as low as 0.015 EU/ml. The lowest level of endotoxin activity in a healthy rat was determined to be 0.009 EU/ml. Endotoxin activity in normal sera determined by LAL, pyrogenic toxin assay (PTA), and the semiquantitative spectrophotometric lipopolysaccharide (LPS) assay were 0.011, 0.016, and 0.019 EU/ml, respectively. Endotoxin activity in normal rats was below the threshold of clinical sepsis based on the current clinical criteria (0.01 EU/ml). The LPS kit kit evaluated in clinical samples failed to recognize no sepsis and below this threshold. The results in endotoxin and healthy rat serum were not significantly different when determined by the LAL kit. The results may differ depending on the kit used. Considering the minimal detectable activity, this study provides evidence for no apparent difference in endotoxin activity between endotoxemia and normal state. Protective effect of glucocorticoids on the reduction of blood pressure induced by the alpha-adrenergic agonist phenylephrine. In this study we analyzed the blood pressure (BP) responses to the injection of an alpha-adrenergic agonist (phenylephrine) in adrenalectomized (ADX) and adrenal intact rats that had been pretreated with either 0.9% NaCl solution (ADX + NaCl group), dexamethasone (ADX + Dex group) or mineralocorticoids (ADX + DOC group) for three weeks. The BP-lowering response to phenylephrine (50 micrograms/100 g body weight i.v.) was significantly smaller in AD
