crysis 64 bit.Q: How to reliably get WCF service hosted on IIS to work on an external machine? I have a WCF service hosted on IIS.
That WCF service is meant to be hosted only on the IIS machine where the web site (hosting the WCF) is running. The web site runs on a separate machine. We use domain authentication, and it works fine. If we host the WCF service on the separate machine and access it over the network, it doesn't work.
Access is denied. If I try to use the server machine itself (which has IIS) as the client machine, I get a "500 Internal server error" when running the client software, when using the address of the server machine hosting the IIS service. Obviously, as soon as we try to access the service externally, all this doesn't work. I found the following solutions: Enable the host IP address in the "inbound rules" on Windows Firewall. In my case this does not work, it only serves to alert the world that I'm using a WCF service I shouldn't be. Disable the web site's "inbound rules" on Windows Firewall. Yes, this does work, and protects the host machine too. However, the problem is, that other machines connected to the network can access the service, even though they aren't a member of the domain. Consider adding the host IP address to a "trusted host" list on the client machine. However, not sure if this will work or not. These are all well and good, but they don't actually work. And I'm wondering if there are any other possible solutions. I've tried setting "allow remote access" to "allow", but I'm still getting denied. EDIT I changed my firewall settings to allow outbound traffic from the WCF machine only, from any address. This seems to have fixed
