theres a lot to think about, i know. im grateful for the chance to do it, and for you and scotts input. i know you dont mean to engage in personal attacks, and your criticisms of me are certainly fair, but im still working out the ethical questions in a way that i can. *note: the metaphor i'm using here isn't scotts, it's hanks. he says mcdonalds is like the wall, the viewer is like the day of groundhog, but in the end, a digression is a digression and both films work as good metaphors, as anything can, even on the surface. (plus it illustrates a great point, you can have two things that are true at once.) the film doesnt seem to be trying to test the idea that if you show the flaw in religion, theres no motivation to keep it alive. its more like one of those movies where theres a really good critique of religion, but you somehow can't say anything about the movie, which leaves me a little confused. im wondering if i should be like, what exactly is the problem, here? i know it's a bit cheeky to criticize people for not writing in the "triple parentheses" i'm using. but i'm not a native english speaker, so i'm a little unsure of the rules. i'm thinking i might be able to make some nits by adding in a few. that'd be great, but i want to read about it. i want to be challenged. i dont want to be spoon-fed something that's done for me. also, sometimes i really get hung up on the details of grammar and syntax, so that's probably why im a little unsure of what exactly is the grammar issue, and what exactly is the syntax issue. (more criticism with...)

its okay if a statement of yours is false, its the nature of statements. youre okay as long as you see that it can be so. i think we should use these principles of getting out of mythology as we design our utopias. as well as thinking of them in terms of management problems. this has to do with conservatism and originalism. conservative ideas are actually far more in conflict with the actual terms of our situation than liberalism is. the conservative idea of what the terms of the situation are have become fixed and immovable. it has become something that you can get the votes for and get elected and get them passed into law and everything that can help people should be passed into law. even when the tories lose on a referendum, they only have to lose by a tiny margin to leave, so they dont really lose because of their own ineptitude, and they can easily win the next time they get a vote. whether they should be trusted with a vote at all is a different question. so what should they have done? refuse to let the scots decide the issue (although they can always get around it by having the uk government call another referendum) that would have been consistent with their anti-monopoly, anti-privatization stance. and what about the liberal democrats? they can be (very) easily destroyed by being in the opposition, and will be if the brexit party gets a sizable enough mandate to win a parliamentary majority. they need to be completely neutral on the issue. i mean, maybe they get along well enough that they don't need to be neutral, but that's not how it works in reality.
